“My approach starts with understanding the client’s business, which I believe is key to finding workable solutions tailored to the client’s needs and industry. Ultimately, my role is not to define a client’s success; my role is to provide a path forward for the client’s business to thrive.”

Rebecca Schach is a member of the firm’s employment law and labor relations team, representing employers in Washington and California on a wide range of employment matters. Her practice includes employment litigation in state and federal court, as well as arbitrations, mediations, and trials. Her experience includes defending employers in wage and hour class actions, collective actions, and representative lawsuits.

Rebecca also provides counsel regarding wage and hour issues, H-2A compliance, and COVID-19 prevention policies, including vaccination mandates and safety standards. As part of her practice she has conducted worksite wage-and-hour audits, workplace violence investigations, and supervisor trainings.

Before joining Miller Nash, Rebecca was with a litigation-focused firm in California where her experience included defending employers in Private Attorneys General Act (PAGA) litigation, state agency prosecutions, including Cal/OSHA, and federal agency Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and Department of Labor investigations.
