“Success in land use and regulatory matters requires not only knowledge of the law, but also relationships with staff, understanding of governmental interests, and appreciation of opponents’ concerns. This comprehensive approach often accelerates the requested government action, reduces the likelihood of legal challenge, and is critical to strategic planning where legal challenges cannot be avoided.”

Steven Liday helps clients navigate the maze of local and state land use laws. He has extensive experience in preparing complex permit applications, appearing at local hearings, defending or challenging land use approvals at both the administrative and judicial levels, as well as advancing/opposing zoning code amendments.

Steven’s core practice includes other areas of administrative law, such as local business licensing, defense of civil enforcement actions, statewide regulation of commercial activities, and participation in/opposition to agency rulemaking. He also handles nonregulatory matters related to land, such as boundary/neighbor disputes, opposition to governmental takings, timber trespass claims, lease disputes, injury to real property, and homeowner association governance.

Steven works throughout the state of Oregon and represents every type of client, from individual property owners to multinational corporations. While equal in importance, Steven adapts his counsel and legal representation to each client’s unique set of goals and circumstances.
