“With a personal background working in management and non-management positions outside of the legal profession, I bring a unique perspective to the work I do on behalf of clients, adding a deeper understanding to the realities of day-to-day management and operations.”

Jess Osborne represents public, private, and nonprofit employers in a variety of employment and labor relations matters. She guides employers through a myriad of issues, including compliance with employment law statutes, challenges with organizational change, organized workforce questions, and conducting workplace investigations. Jess also represents clients in employment litigation matters related to wrongful discharge, wage and hour, and other related areas.

In her labor relations practice, Jess assists clients with contract negotiations and administration and negotiating collective bargaining agreements. She also represents employers in labor arbitrations and before the National Labor Relations Board.

Before joining Miller Nash, Jess practiced at a boutique employment and labor firm after working as a litigator with national law firms where she represented clients in a variety of areas, including legal ethics and risk management, mass torts, complex commercial, and employment law. Jess is an active volunteer with many community and industry organizations, with a specific dedication to supporting the LGBTQIA+ communities.
