Andrea Stolpe is a partner and member of the firm's employment law & labor relations and education law practice teams. Andrea rejoined Miller Nash in 2023 after six years at the University of Portland, during which time she served as the university's vice president and general counsel. In that role, she advised the leadership cabinet and Board of Regents, oversaw all legal affairs for the university, and partnered with campus stakeholders and departments, including human resources, financial affairs, academic affairs, student conduct, Title IX, and athletics. She now provides outside general counsel services and advice to clients in all industries.

Andrea's time serving as in-house counsel and partnering with human resource professionals provides clients with a unique and informed perspective to help prevent, identify, and resolve legal challenges facing them as employers. Andrea represents local and national businesses and employers in all areas of employment law, providing counsel and day-to-day advice to employers and human resources administrators on employment matters, including performance management, workplace investigations, pay equity, disability discrimination and accommodation, retaliation, employment discrimination, and employee threat assessment. Andrea also regularly advises and represents employers in response to demand letters and state and federal agency complaints alleging employment discrimination claims.

Andrea uses her industry knowledge and experience to advise education clients on all aspects of campus operations, including student conduct policies and processes; student accommodation questions; employment issues, including workplace concerns, tenure, and promotion; policy review and risk management; and crisis response and communications. Andrea has particularly deep experience advising education clients on complex student conduct and Title IX matters, working closely with Title IX administrators, investigators, and conduct professionals on policy and compliance questions with an approach that is guided by a knowledge of the regulatory framework and a recognition of the client's mission and values.
