“Representing litigants on appeal involves careful and mindful work, as well as a keen sense of how a client’s particular needs fit within the broader fabric of the law. In serving our clients, I draw on a broad variety of litigation experience and a particular passion for the challenges of public law.”

Aaron Landau focuses his practice on appellate advocacy and complex issues of public law. He represents both public entities and private clients in appeals of civil litigation, including business disputes, torts, and administrative decisions.

Aaron works extensively with public bodies and officials on issues that shape governance and accountability, such as state and local elections, public records matters, and state constitutional questions. He has also handled a wide range of business and commercial disputes, ranging from health care to product liability. His approach emphasizes thoughtful analysis, collaboration, and service, whether advocating in the appellate courts or advising clients on complex legal questions.

In addition to his work as an attorney, Aaron teaches a course in Oregon civil procedure at the University of Oregon School of Law. Before becoming an attorney, Aaron was a founding member and bassist for a modern jazz ensemble in Portland.
